

higher Leyton scores and frequency of obsessional neurosis in the Irish population.

The authors admit that one cannot assume that the orthopaedic patients are representative of the population at large. Moreover, they acknowledge that all three samples were biased towards younger males. However, they note that it is unlikely that the differences in obsessiveness can be attributed to these biases as they were present in all three samples. Indeed, the differences in obsessiveness noted between the three orthopaedic samples paralleled the differences in the prevalence of obsessional neurosis between the parent populations in those countries.

The editors of this volume correctly note that while there has been a proliferation of mental health literature focussing on sociocultural characteristics of Hispanic patients, their underutilization of mental health services, and etiologic factors influencing their psychopathology, there is generally less attention given to specific clinical issues and culturally appropriate intervention strategies. This book attempts to fill this gap. Its 13 chapters cover four areas of clinical importance: sociocultural perspectives, major syndromes, groups of special concern, and the delivery of services.

On the theme of socio-cultural perspectives, Ruiz (a Puerto Rican psychiatrist) notes that the problem of bilingualism is central for the Hispanic patient. Language barriers are critical in any attempt at diagnosis and treatment. Greater psychopathology has been diagnosed when Hispanics are interviewed in English than when the interview is conducted in Spanish. Moreover, language switching, accompanied by lengthy pauses, may be used as a form of resistance "through the diffusion of emotionally charged material".
