

Sampling types

Several sampling types guide qualitative research, and because designs are emergent, sampling may change as a study progresses. In grounded theory, for instance, sampling moves into more focused theoretical sampling as a study progresses. The researcher may return to a participant and question him or her more specifically about a theoretical construct, such as the concept of “making it work” in a study about having a child with a disability. This sampling approach helps ensure theoretical categories become saturated.

Sampling type	Comments
Convenience or volunteer	<ul style="list-style-type: none">• Participants readily available• Easy, efficient• Might not be “information rich”
Purposive	<ul style="list-style-type: none">• Participants selected because they benefit the study (for example, selecting for varying demographics or ranges of experience)
Shadow	<ul style="list-style-type: none">• Participants speak of others’ experiences in addition to their own
Snowball or chain	<ul style="list-style-type: none">• Early participants refer others• Easy, efficient• Might not be “information rich”
