

of the papers varies considerably; the background is set by good keynote addresses followed by some useful reviews on pertinent topics such as soil constraints to legume production. The contradictory ideas expressed on associative symbioses emphasize the scientific disagreement in this area. One is surprised to find in this section a review criticizing certain methods alongside papers using those same methods. The section on Azolla gives a fascinating insight into the way in which this interesting symbiosis is exploited in China and the papers on N-fixing non-leguminous trees are excellent. There are some interesting scientific assessments of the traditional farming practice of intercropping in the final section.

Overall, the book is a useful collection of papers covering a wide spectrum of BNF interests and is good value for money. It is unfortunate that the editors were not more ruthless because some of the papers could have been omitted without detriment to the whole.

K. E. Giller and J. M. Day

Controlled Breeding in Farm Animals. By I. Gordon. Oxford: Pergamon Press (1983), pp. 436, £15.00, $30.00.

How refreshing to review a volume covering a wide field of research which is not the result of disparate contributions from different authors but which contains the considered views of a single author with wide-ranging interests. The result is an attractive and well illustrated book written with understanding and authority. In describing various techniques the author strikes a good balance, explaining what might be expected from each method but, at the same time, being realistic about practical experience to date. The book goes into considerable detail about the different ways in which reproduction in cattle, sheep, pigs and horses can be controlled and manipulated. This is the book to turn to whether the need is for information about the control of oestrus in pigs, embryo transfer in cattle or advancing the breeding season in sheep. I am not able to judge the horse section, but am willing to bet that this book will prove a winner.

Nitrogen Cycling in South-East Asian Wet Monsoonal Ecosystems. Edited by R. Wetslar, J. R. Simpson and T. Rosswall. Canberra: Australian Academy of Sciences (1981), pp. 216, $A25.00.

This book is the proceedings of a Regional Workshop held in Thailand in 1979, arranged jointly by the SCOPE/UNEP International Nitrogen Unit of the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences and Chiang Mai University. It contains 34 short papers and reports of five working groups.

More than half the volume is concerned with wetland rice and this section begins with a useful review giving nitrogen balances from long-term experiments in Japan, the Philippines and Thailand. These experiments indicate inputs of nitrogen from biological fixation of 5 to 50 kg N ha⁻¹ crop⁻¹. This theme is taken up in many of the other papers. Results are presented from field and laboratory experiments designed to understand, measure or increase the contribution of biologically fixed nitrogen to rice nutrition. Papers on the recovery of fertilizer nitrogen by rice show that progress has already been made in decreasing losses but considerable scope for further improvement still exists: crop recoveries range from 10% to 70% in different situations. Other papers deal with the gains and losses of nitrogen by soils under tree crops or natural vegetation. Attention is given to the role of leguminous cover crops in increasing the supply of nitrogen to tree crops.

The different papers in this book vary considerably in both scientific interest and practical applicability but the average is high and some are excellent. A particular merit is that the book contains data not previously available in English, for example results of experiments with ¹⁵N-labelled fertilizers from Japan, China and Taiwan. For this reason alone it will be of value to those working on any aspect of the nitrogen cycle in tropical areas, not only in South-East Asia.
