her mother This scenario illustrates one of the most profound truths about human experience our thoughts not our circumstances largely determine how we feel and behave The same external event can trigger vastly different emotional responses depending on how we interpret and process it mentally This is the foundational principle of cognitive therapy a revolutionary approach to mental health that has transformed millions of lives since its development in the 1960s Cognitive therapy operates on the understanding that our thoughts feelings and behaviors are interconnected in a dynamic triangle When we change one element the others naturally follow Unlike traditional psychotherapy approaches that focus primarily on past experiences or unconscious motivations cognitive therapy concentrates on the here and now examining the specific thought patterns that create and maintain emotional distress The human mind processes approximately 60 000 thoughts per day many of them automatic and below our conscious awareness These automatic thoughts serve as a running commentary on our experiences interpreting events and assigning meaning to everything that happens to us When these interpretations are accurate and balanced they help us navigate life effectively However when they become distorted or overly negative they can trap us in cycles of depression anxiety anger and despair
