Marriage/Couples' Counseling:

1)

Psychoanalytic Theory

Based on the theory of object relations. This theory focuses on generational relationship development. The objects are parents such as a mother-daughter bond formed during early childhood development. These early developments and bonds formed with parents are brought into adulthood and subsequently enter into marriages. Therapy for couples with this theoretical focus involves the counselor gaining crucial insight into each person's parental relationships. Each person then transfers reorganized thoughts based on reactions, expectations, and perceptions of themselves and others onto the therapist. The counselor may also use dream work, interpretation, and resistance analysis in their therapeutic technique. The outcome of this theoretical approach is typically that catharsis will occur for couples by allowing them to acquire nascent insights into their lives, which creates space for altering the behaviors that probably caused the couples to seek therapy to begin with (Newsome & Gladding, 2014).

2)

Social-Learning Theory

Newsome and Gladding (2014) describe social-learning theory as "learning through modeling and imitation." Essentially, the theory says that we learn a lot of what we know by observing the behaviors of others and couples who seek therapy have too many or too few important behaviors. An example of not enough is someone not knowing how to resolve arguments with their partner and an example of an excess is
