In what has now become the standard model for sequence stratigraphy, a depositional sequence comprises an unconformity-bounded package of genetically related strata, whose internal geometries are influenced largely by fluctuating sea level (Fig. 1). This model evolved from regional mapping (Sloss 1963), and was later developed from seismic-reflection profiles on passive continental margins (Payton 1977). It was further extended to a higher resolution using data from the surface and subsurface in many geological settings (Mutti 1985; Wilgus et al. 1988; Van Wagoner et al. 1990). Here we do not provide a comprehensive summary of the terminology that has grown-up around sequence stratigraphy: judging by its sparse usage within the papers of this volume much of it is redundant anyway. The interested reader should refer to the reviews of Haq (1991), Vail et al. (1991), Mitchum & Van Wagoner (1991), Posamentier et al. (1992) and Posamentier & James (1993) for further details. In essence, sequence stratigraphy is practised through the recognition of key surfaces which define the boundaries of packages of genetically related strata (systems tracts) and by the recognition

Fig. 1. The standard sequence stratigraphical model for siliciclastic systems (based on Haq et al. 1988 and Christie-Blick & Driscoll 1995) showing the different areas covered by papers in this volume. Wright (this volume) and Coe (this volume) discuss successions that were carbonate ramps, with an implied sequence stratigraphical character not dissimilar to siliciclastic deposits (see Schlager 1992; Tucker et al. 1993). A sequence boundary (SB) is defined as an unconformity and its basinward correlative conformity. The lower of the sequence boundaries in this figure (type 1) is distinguished from the upper one (type 2) by its association with 'fan' sedimentation at the toe of slope, which has been related to rapid, high-magnitude, relative sea-level fall. The maximum flooding surface (MFS) corresponds to the time of greatest landward extent of the facies belts within a depositional sequence, and is characterized by detrital sediment starvation in basinward regions. The transgressive surface (TS) is a widespread horizon across which deep-water sediments abruptly overlie shallow water sediments, and it forms as the underlying progradational sedimentary succession is flooded by rising relative sea level. Systems tracts are defined between these key surfaces. For full discussion of this model, definition of systems tracts and their relation to relative and eustatic sea-level change the reader should refer to Haq et al. (1988), Posamentier & Vail (1988), Posamentier et al. (1988, 1990, 1992), Mitchum & Van Wagoner (1991), Vail et al. (1991) Jacquini et al. (1992) and Posamentier & James (1993). Useful critiques and alternative models are provided by Miall (1986), Galloway (1989), Carter et al. (1991), Fulthorpe (1991), Schlager (1991), Walker (1992) and Christie-Blick & Driscoll (1995), and references therein. As a substitute for depositional sequences as defined above, Galloway (1989) has proposed use of genetic stratigraphic sequences bounded by maximum flooding surfaces, and his approach has also been followed by many workers.
