Current Paleoethnobotany Christine A. Hastorf,Virginia S. Popper,1988 Paleoethnobotany offers powerful tools for reconstructing past cultures by examining the interaction of human populations with the plant world Plant remains from archaeological sites can provide information for a number of disciplines archaeologists may use such remains to examine how plants were used how agriculture changed over time or how plant offerings in burials signaled social status ecologists and botanists may use them to study morphological changes in plants due to domestication Combining case studies and theoretical discussions Current Paleoethnobotany presents the first full discussion of the major stages and problems of paleoethnobotanical research from designing and testing equipment such as flotation machines to quantification and interpretation The volume explores a wide range of issues concerning collection techniques analytical procedures and interpretive models that will provide accurate information about past human societies from plant remains The contributors offer data on specific regions as well as more general background information on the basic techniques of paleoethnobotany for the nonspecialist Throughout they explicitly examine the assumptions underlying paleoethnobotanical methods and the ways in which those assumptions affect anthropological and ecological research questions Based on a symposium presented at the 1985 meeting of the Society for American Archaeology Current Paleoethnobotany moves beyond a technique oriented view of paleoethnobotany to successfully integrate current thinking about both procedures and research goals The contributors demonstrate the potential value of the field of paleoethnobotany and open the way for further discussion and improvement

Integrating Zooarchaeology and Paleoethnobotany Amber VanDerwarker,Tanya M. Peres,2010-01-22 In recent years scholars have emphasized the need for more holistic subsistence analyses and collaborative publications towards this endeavor have become more numerous in the literature. However, there are relatively few attempts to qualitatively integrate zooarchaeological animal and paleoethnobotanical plant data, and even fewer attempts to quantitatively integrate these two types of subsistence evidence. Given the vastly different methods used in recovering and quantifying these data, not to mention their different preservational histories, it is no wonder that so few have undertaken this problem. Integrating Zooarchaeology and Paleoethnobotany takes the lead in tackling this important issue by addressing the methodological limitations of data integration, proposing new methods and innovative ways of using established methods, and highlighting case studies that successfully employ these methods to shed new light on ancient foodways. The volume challenges the perception that plant and animal foodways are distinct and contends that the separation of the analysis of archaeological plant and animal remains sets up a false dichotomy between these portions of the diet. In advocating qualitative and quantitative data integration, the volume establishes a clear set of methods for 1) determining the suitability of data integration in any particular case and 2) carrying out an integrated qualitative or quantitative approach.
