Legend of Man's Hunger in His Youth

by Thomas Wolfe

author of
LOOK HOMeward, ANGEL

In this novel Thomas Wolfe recalls the youth of Samson Lewis in the North Carolinian mountains south of Asheville. Lewis said that "he may have chosen to be the greatest American writer . . . in fact I don't see why he should not be one of the greatest world writers." And Thomas Wolfe's new novel, like "Look Homeward, Angel" is, he writes Samson Lewis again, "in days and spaces that I share with the whole of life."

It is an epic of the quest and pilgrimage of youth, specifically of an American, but essentially of the young man in all lands and ages. This pilgrimage begins in Asheville, the home of childhood, and takes him through a great variety of adventures in Europe, the East, and New York, thence to Oxford and finally to Paris and the mountains of France, from which he returns to America, inevitably drawn back to the great, repeating continent he had had in his memory and dream.

For music and rhythm, for dramatic of prose and background, variety of thought, individuality of characters, for theme, great poetry, irony, and profoundly moving imagery, this novel is a work of the first rank and of the first order. It is a work of the first rank and of the first order. It is a work of the first rank and of the first order. It is a work of the first rank and of the first order.
