

Book Review

Preventive Parenting with Love, Encouragement and Limits. By Thomas J. Dishion and Scott G. Patterson. Eugene, OR: Castalia Publishing Co. 1996. Pp. 126.

The second child of a friend of mine, a four-year-old girl, stays up till the early hours of the morning without seeming to need much sleep either at night or during the day. Her mother, a behavioral pediatrician, is able to handle her child's atypical sleeping routine very well although I suspect that sometimes she would like her child to go to bed somewhat earlier. Other parents, who do not have her training in behavioral pediatrics, may be able to develop some of her expertise in dealing with toddlers and pre-school-age children by reading and completing the exercises presented by Dishion and Patterson in their wonderful little book on Preventive Parenting. In this book they have used a step-by-step approach to explain "how to handle everyday problems, promote the wellbeing of your children, and create a positive family atmosphere" (p. xi). The authors believe that well-adjusted children need a balanced mixture of parent's love, encouragement of positive efforts and behaviors, and the setting of consistent limits to preempt misbehavior.

The book has eight short chapters, each accompanied by a home practice activity. In the introduction the authors tell us that preventive parenting deals with both the short-term and long-term effects of parenting. They believe that focusing on short-term goals may set the stage for their children to engage in problem behaviors through accidental training or negative reinforcement. They also discuss what parents can do when events occur over which they have little direct control. Through positive reframing of the problem or event, parents can teach their children more positive ways of behaving. Finally, they discuss one of the most common problems of young parents—their lack of self-control when their child engages in problem behaviors. Parents sometimes lose their own sense of control when trying to teach the child self-control!
