

- Massage is one of many types of physical therapy, all of which promote healing through moving or manipulating the patient's body in a non-invasive fashion

* Nurses reduce emotional and psychological stress that prevent the mind and body from functioning optimally, thereby leading to illness or disease - by helping the patient to relax and feel good.

- There is a well-established connection between psychosocial and physical healing – especially in Eastern medical systems, the flow of Qi is influenced by the states of thought and body
- Thus, for therapy to be effective, the patient must be in a relaxed state (mentally and physically)
- Touch is the method by which the physical therapy and the psychological/emotional aspects of therapy are carried out
- The therapist establishes a touch relationship with the patient that allows caring, nurturing, and compassion
- There are several touch techniques: pressing, hooking, patting, lifting, stretching, rubbing, brushing, kneading, shaking, grasping, and rolling, or the therapist might also work across the patient's back
- Touch is applied with whatever amount of pressure is appropriate, given the patient's condition as it is diagnosed by the therapist

- The impact of the pressure, manipulation, stretching, and motion central to bodywork therapies, like Shiatsu, affect physiological changes in the body that promote healing restoration of the flow of ki throughout the body.

Impaired circulation	Tension in muscles impairs the flow of blood (transport of nutrients and energy in, and removal from, tissues) and lymph (conduit to the functioning of the immune system). Both of which are necessary for body maintenance, repair, and defense against disease or infection.
Reduction of tension	Absence of complete recovery from psychologic or emotional trauma manifests in the body as tension in muscle that may impair circulation, but can also affect the skeletal structure of the body sufficiently to impair function and mobility, including range of motion, and the proper tracking of joints and activities.
Reduction of tension from muscle	Consequence of tension/trauma in muscle is that tension and muscle growth of metabolism cannot be effectively cleared by blood and lymph.
