Among the 1.4 million active duty U.S. military service members, 6% receive outpatient treatment for a mental disorder each year. Over 25% of these service members leave military service within 6 months, a rate that is more than two times higher than the rate following treatment for any other illness category. There is clearly a need to define psychiatric research priorities and an unprecedented opportunity to enhance the field of psychiatric research in general using the well-characterized military population. The first priority is to better define the burden of mental disorders in terms of incidence, prevalence, severity, risk factors, and health care use. The impact of mental disorders on occupational functioning, particularly among new recruits, needs to be better characterized. Suicide research should include efforts to validate mortality data, define the normal level of rate variability, and establish surveillance for clusters. The highly structured occupational environment of the military lends itself to studies of preventive interventions designed to reduce disability or occupational attrition resulting from mental/behavioral problems.

Introduction

Recent data suggest that of all major illness categories, mental disorders have the greatest impact on soldier readiness.¹ Among the 1.4 million active duty U.S. military service members, mental disorders are the leading cause of hospitalization for men and the second leading cause for women (second only to pregnancy-related admissions). Six percent of military personnel receive outpatient treatment for a mental disorder each year, according to automated ambulatory health utilization records.¹ Over 25% of service members who receive outpatient care for a mental disorder leave military service within 6 months, a rate that is more than two times higher than attrition following treatment for any other International Classification of Diseases, 9th revision, Clinical Modification illness category.¹ Among persons entering enlisted military service, fully one-third fail to complete their first term of enlistment.^{2,3} Nearly one-half of this early attrition occurs during the initial entry training (IET) period, particularly during basic training. A rough estimate, based on extrapolating data from several reports, is that approximately one-half of all attrition in the IET period involves mental, psychosocial, or behavioral problems.²⁻⁴ This estimate is imprecise because of the widely varying administrative discharge practices between services and installations.⁵

These data do not suggest that U.S. service members are at higher risk of mental disorders than the general population and are consistent with studies from civilian populations. Nevertheless, the data speak to the pervasive nature and occupational burden of mental disorders even in this healthy segment of the population. Military medical research priorities have traditionally focused on management of acute stress casualties, and efforts (largely unsuccessful) to develop screening instruments pertaining to the suitability of enlistment.⁵⁻⁷ In addition, there is a long history of survey research assessing the role of a broad range of operational and nonoperational stressors on the health and well-being of military personnel.⁸ In contrast, there is a paucity of research characterizing the prevalence, onset, and impairment of mental disorders and even less focusing on the development and evaluation of new preventive interventions.

The U.S. military offers a tremendous resource for the field of psychiatric research. The population consists of predominantly young healthy working adults with universal access to comprehensive health care. Very few populations offer as accurate denominator data. Large automated data systems have recently been created that capture virtually all inpatient and outpatient health care use while linking these data with other population-wide administrative databases containing demographic and occupational information.^{1,9-11} Data are also available related to pharmacy use, injuries, alcohol and drug rehabilitation, family violence, and mortality. Although not all are currently linked with the health care utilization data, there are clearly research opportunities available given appropriate safeguards of privacy and confidentiality. For the first time, comprehensive population-based psychiatric research is possible in the military. Opportunities for military psychiatric research have also emerged lately related to research on medical problems following deployment to the Gulf War. The purpose of this article is to identify key priorities for military psychiatric research.

Future Nikolas Rose, 2018-11-26 Our everyday lives are increasingly intertwined with psychiatry and discussions of mental health Yet the dominant medical discipline of psychiatry remains surrounded by controversy Is mental distress really an illness like any other treatable by drugs Can psychiatrists differentiate between mental disorders normal eccentricities anxieties or even sadness Should the power of psychiatrists be challenged by the knowledge of those with lived experience of mental ill health In this penetrating analysis Nikolas Rose critiques the powerful part that psychiatry has come to play in the lives of so many across the world A series of chapters each tackling an area of dispute head on opens wide the terrain of debate addressing issues such as advances in brain science the politics of Western psychiatry s spread across the globe and recent evidence of social adversity s role in producing mental ill health The answers we find to these pressing questions will shape the psychiatric futures that are being brought into existence Ultimately this book proposes a radically different future no less evidence based or rigorous and indeed far more attuned to the realities of mental health and argues that as a branch
