Nelson, 2002 CONTEXT Hormone replacement therapy HRT is widely used to prevent osteoporosis and fractures OBJECTIVE To systematically review and evaluate studies of the use of estrogen and selective estrogen receptor modulators SERMs to prevent bone loss and fractures in healthy postmenopausal women DATA SOURCES Studies with English language abstracts identified in MEDLINE HealthSTAR and Cochrane Library databases from 1994 to May 2001 Reference lists of key articles and meta analyses were also reviewed STUDY SELECTION Only randomized controlled trials and cohort studies were included DATA EXTRACTION Studies meeting inclusion criteria were formally abstracted and quality was rated using criteria developed by the U S Preventive Services Task Force USPSTF DATA SYNTHESIS For bone density outcomes randomized controlled trials consistently indicated improved bone density with estrogen use These findings were similar between prevention and treatment trials opposed and unopposed regimens oral and transdermal forms of estrogen and types of progestins For fracture outcomes 5 randomized controlled trials of estrogen were identified and none met criteria to be ranked as a good quality study A primary prevention trial indicated a significant decrease in risk of nonvertebral fractures in 1 of 2 estrogen arms None of the other trials indicated a significant risk reduction with estrogen

but all had important methodologic limitations A recent meta analysis of 22 trials of estrogen many with unpublished data reported an overall 27% reduction in nonvertebral fractures relative risk RR 0.73 confidence interval CI 0.56-0.94 Six good quality cohort studies were identified and 3 of 4 studies reported 20% to 35% reductions in adjusted relative risks for hip fractures among ever users In randomized controlled trials raloxifene increased bone density at lumbar spine hip and wrist sites and tamoxifen modestly increased bone density at the hip and spine although results were inconsistent between studies The largest trial of raloxifene reported a protective effect for vertebral fractures RR 0.59 95% CI 0.05-0.70 but not for nonvertebral fractures A large trial of tamoxifen indicated no statistically significant fracture benefit CONCLUSIONS The results of these studies support a benefit for estrogen in improving bone density and protecting against fractures although the evidence for fractures is based on one arm of one randomized controlled trial and good quality cohort studies Trials indicate that raloxifene increases bone density and protects against vertebral fractures

Hormone Replacement Therapy and Osteoporosis U. S. Department of Health and Human Services, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, 2013-06-28 In this review we systematically review the medical literature and evaluate data on the use of hormone replacement therapy HRT to prevent osteoporosis in healthy postmenopausal women Specifically we focus on the effects of estrogen with and without progestins on fracture and bone density outcomes We also review studies of selective estrogen receptor modulators SERMs because of their emerging role in preventing osteoporosis This report is part of a larger project on the risks and benefits of HRT prepared for the U S Preventive Services Task Force USPSTF to assist them in making recommendations The term osteoporosis describes both a process of decreasing bone density as well as the clinical outcome of fracture Bone density can be measured by a number of techniques and at a number of anatomical sites although the measures most often used in studies are dual energy xray absorptiometry DXA of the hip spine heel or wrist A World Health Organization WHO working group proposed that osteoporosis should be diagnosed when bone mineral density BMD is 2.5 standard deviations below the mean for healthy young adult women at the spine hip or wrist or when a history of an atraumatic fracture is present The working group also proposed that low bone mass or osteopenia be diagnosed when bone density is between 1.0 to 2.5 standard deviations below the young healthy mean The number of standard deviation units above or below the young healthy mean is called the T score This measure is often used in eligibility criteria for treatment trials and is used clinically to diagnose osteoporosis Osteoporosis affects a large proportion of American women over the age of 50 An estimated 12 million 41% white women over age 50 met WHO criterion for osteopenia and 5 million 15% met WHO criterion for osteoporosis The prevalence of osteoporosis in Hispanic women is similar to white women while rates in black women are approximately half that of the other groups 8% By the WHO definition up to 70% of women over age 80 have osteoporosis based on low measurements at the spine hip or wrist Age is an important factor in the relationship between bone density and the absolute risk of fracture An increase in age of 13 years increases the risk of hip fracture by the same amount as a one standard deviation decrease in bone density Older women have a much higher fracture rate than younger women with the same bone density because of increasing risk from other factors such as bone quality and tendency to fall Women with osteoporosis are more likely to have fractures and demographic trends for hip fracture parallel those for osteoporosis Hip fracture incidence in white women rises from 50 per 100 000 women at age 50 to 237 per 100 000 women at age 65 White women are generally 2 to 3 times more likely than non white women to suffer a hip fracture Wrist fracture incidence tends to increase at earlier ages than hip fractures with 268 per 100 000 women at age 45 to 54 Sixteen percent of postmenopausal women have osteoporosis of the lumbar spine and among white women 5% of 50 year olds and 25% of 80 year olds have had at least one vertebral fracture Key questions include Does hormone replacement therapy improve or stabilize bone density Does postmenopausal use of SERMs improve or stabilize bone density Does hormone replacement therapy prevent osteoporotic fractures Does postmenopausal use of SERMs prevent osteoporotic fractures
