

PRINCIPLES OF FOOD PRESERVATION

In accomplishing the preservation of foods by the various methods, the following principles are involved:

1. Prevention or delay of microbial decomposition

- a. By keeping out microorganisms (asepsis)
- b. By removal of microorganisms, e.g., by filtration
- c. By hindering the growth and activity of microorganisms, e.g., by low temperatures, drying, anaerobic conditions, or chemicals
- d. By killing the microorganisms, e.g., by heat or radiation

2. Prevention or delay of self-decomposition of the food

- a. By destruction or inactivation of food enzymes, e.g., by blanching
- b. By prevention or delay of purely chemical reactions, e.g., prevention of oxidation by means of an antioxidant

3. Prevention of damage because of insects, animals, mechanical causes

The methods used to control the activities of microorganisms usually are effective against enzymatic activity in the food or chemical reactions. Methods such as drying and the use of low temperatures, however, permit autodecomposition to continue unless special precautions are taken. For example, most vegetables are blanched (heated) to inactivate their enzymes before being frozen.
