

SAN design principles – configure storage array

This slide represents the second principle of Storage Area Network design: configuring the storage array. The purpose of this slide is to show you the guidelines for configuring the storage array, peak period activity, and caching techniques for servers, such as write and read cache.

Guidelines

- RAID groups are used to provide a specific level of input/output performance, capacity, and redundancy, and LUNs are assigned to RAID groups based on these needs
- If a particular RAID group cannot meet the required input/output performance, capacity, and response times, a different RAID group must be defined for the next set of LUNs
- Distribute the RAID groups across all internal channels and access paths in the storage arrays to achieve the required performance levels of input/output operations per second and response times

Peak Period Activity

- While designing SAN, base it on the peak-period activity and consider the nature of the input/output within each peak period
- Instantaneous peaks in input/output requirements may require additional storage array resources to be able to handle the workload
- Without additional resources, the IO requirements during peak periods may not be met, leading to performance degradation or even failure of the SAN

Caching

- Server systems can benefit from write cache, but the cache can become saturated if the input/output workload is intense enough
- Saturation of the cache reduces its effectiveness
- Cache is often allocated from a global pool, so it is essential to distribute it only if it is effective
- Read cache uses:
 - Read-ahead cache is helpful for certain activities that involve sequential IO, such as backups or accessing template repositories
 - Read cache may not be necessary when the application and operating system cache data are already stored within the virtual machine's memory
