1. The first part of the report describes the experimental setup and the results of the measurements. The second part discusses the theoretical background and the interpretation of the data. The third part presents the conclusions and the outlook for future work.

2. The experimental setup consists of a laser source, a sample, and a detector. The laser source is a Nd:YAG laser operating at 1064 nm. The sample is a thin film of the material of interest. The detector is a photodiode array.

3. The results of the measurements show that the intensity of the reflected light decreases as the thickness of the film increases. This is in agreement with the theoretical predictions.

4. The theoretical background is based on the theory of thin film interference. The intensity of the reflected light is given by the following equation:

$$I_r = I_0 \frac{1 - R^2}{1 - R^2 \cos^2 \delta}$$ where I_r is the intensity of the reflected light, I_0 is the intensity of the incident light, R is the reflectance of the film, and δ is the phase shift.

5. The conclusions are that the experimental results are in good agreement with the theoretical predictions. The outlook for future work is to study the effect of the film thickness on the reflectance.
