Political Choices and Electoral Consequences Keith Archer,1990-08-01 The most important link between labour and the NDP is the direct party affiliation of union locals While this sort of affiliation had existed with the CCF the Canadian Labour Congress showed a greater commitment to encouraging union locals to affiliate with the NDP Although as Archer discusses in both theoretical and empirical terms individuals who belong to union locals formally linked to the NDP are more likely to vote for that party than are other people with similar socio demographic characteristics this has had little positive effect on the NDP s fortunes Archer reveals that although in principle each union local may favour high rates of affiliation it is often not in a local s self interest to affiliate Archer suggests that the main reason for such a disappointing record of affiliation is structural rather than ideological or cultural He compares the Canadian situation to that in Britain where the Labour Party rules governing affiliation have supported high rates of affiliation The rules of the NDP Archer goes on to show are not significantly different from those that were developed between labour and the CCF However the CCF was not a labour party as such but rather an amalgam of farmers labourers and members of constituency associations Labour s role has consequently remained that of a junior partner with the constituency groups Under these circumstances Archer argues one would expect rates of affiliation to remain low
