

An Investigation of the Properties of Polymer Concrete

By J. Douglas Burstein, Clarence G. Long, Jr.,
Constantin C. Ambrusches, and Max W. Rouse

Summary:

An investigation of various types of polymer concrete compositions was undertaken to consider the distribution possibilities of these new materials for building construction. A number of polymeric compositions were prepared and tested under various conditions of curing, curing media, and curing rate. The resulting materials were then tested. The compressive strength of these materials varied from 10,000 to 20,000 psi (70 to 140 MPa) and the modulus of elasticity varied from 100 to 150 x 10⁶ psi (7 to 10 x 10⁹ Pa). The materials were tested under various conditions of curing and curing media. The results of the investigation are presented in the following tables.

These data show that polymer concrete is a very promising material for building construction. The results of this investigation show that polymer concrete compositions can be used in a wide variety of building construction applications.
