Regionalism as used in this paper is thus seen as the joint action by jurisdictional authorities to formulate and enforce policy decisions in economic and growth management options that go beyond jurisdictional boundaries and to also complement existing regional and national development initiatives. Explaining this definition, Basha and Cussey (2008) talk of the need for communities to pursue their interests but not at the detriment of others; and be responsible for their own actions by minimizing the harm it imposes on others. Ensuring local participation in the planning process (vertical inclusivity) is one thing, but making local planning authorities collaborate in dealing with common developmental challenges (horizontal inclusivity) is another. Drawing on some key issues in the discussions on regionalism, this paper presents a framework –which integrates regionalism in Ghana's decentralised planning model– as it deals with its urbanisation challenges.
