explores the contemporary response to the picture books of three pioneer Victorian illustrators of children s books Walter Crane Randolph Caldecott and Kate Greenaway Over a century after their first printing the picture books are striking breathtaking in their line color and design The author frames the horizons of expectation the context of assumptions and values that shaped the way picture books were read and reviewed by their audience and examines their critical reception with a summary of their reputation over the last century Finally Lundin positions the three artists in relationship to each other and examines the historiography of the trio s canonization The role of librarians booksellers and publishers was critical in making these names prominent through the twentieth century The book illustrates that reputations are made not born and many cultural mediators are at work in the marketplace of children s literature Dictionary Catalog of the Research
