✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Inventory management plays a vital role in the efficient work of healthcare organizations. While inventory management in business organizations primarily refers to the turnover of the products, in the healthcare system, inefficient organization of inventory can present a risk to the patients' lives. The situation is worsened because it is impossible to estimate the number of necessary materials due to the unpredictable nature of patients' needs. Thus, medical inventory involves a complex system of storage to ensure that the necessary items are available upon demand.

Firstly, the most common inventory items in healthcare organizations include gloves, masks, gowns, and syringes. Surgical kits and supplies include dressing materials, such as gauze pads, bandages, needles, and blades. Lastly, the healthcare organization inventory includes items of high value, such as equipment for patient transportation, anesthesia machines, and defibrillators. Thus, effectively storing the wide range of items used in a healthcare organization requires implementing a sophisticated inventory system.

Next, the ABC analysis approach to the inventory management system is based on the classification of inventory items in three categories based on their importance. The analysis presents one of the most effective tools available in the management of resources (Deressa et al., 2022). However, the system also considers the items' consumption value and percentage in the total inventory. Thus, the gloves, masks, gowns, and syringes are classified in the C category with low monetary value. The items from the C category occupy a big proportion of the inventory because of their high flow and necessity for the organization's functioning. More valuable items are also used frequently in healthcare organizations, but in smaller quantities, such as surgical supplies, including gauze pads, bandages, needles, and blades, are classified as B items. Lastly, more expensive items necessary for different health care services, which also present a smaller part of the overall inventory, such as medical devices and equipment, are classified as A items.
