

SRT Systems & Equipment

SRT Ascent Systems must grab the line in two places, allowing the climber to put their weight on one grab while advancing the other. This allows the climber to move upward. A rope grab can be as basic as a foot lock technique or a prusik. Most climbers prefer the ease and efficiency of mechanical ascenders.

Ascenders: These mechanical devices use a cam that allows movement along the line in one direction, but holds the line from the opposite direction. The cams must always be engaged or completely disengaged. To remove the ascender, it must be completely unloaded. Ascenders are for ascent only! They are not designed for taking a fall or for lateral loading.

There are numerous ways to configure SRT climbing systems. These are a few:

Basic SRT System

A Basic system uses a hand ascender and a foot ascender. A prusik is installed above the hand ascender and secured to the climber. A second secure connection is made with a cord from the hand ascender to the climber. The climber stands on the foot ascender and advances the hand ascender. Resting on the hand ascender or supporting the weight with the arms allows the climber to take another step up the line with the foot ascender.

Rope Walker SRT System

A Rope Walker adds a foot loop to the hand ascender, which makes the system much more efficient. This allows the climber to "walk" up the line, alternating between standing on the foot ascender and standing in the foot loop. The climber's weight is always on one foot.

Frog SRT System

An ascender designed to be attached to the harness is a smooth way to provide a second secure line attachment for ascent. Some type of shoulder strap is necessary to keep the device in place with the climber as they move up and the foot ascender pulls the rope down.

A hybrid device can be used in place of the Groll in a Frog system.

Safety Note

A second, life-support connection from climber to climb line is recommended in most systems.

Tending SRT Devices

When using a chest ascender or hybrid device in a frog system, you need a means of holding the device to keep it in place as the rope is pulled through the bottom of the system.

Petzl Secur or Torse

A Petzl Secur or Torse will work with most harnesses. The tail is attached to the rear of the harness, and worn around the neck where it attaches to the device and pulls it up along with the climber.

Lanyard Over the Shoulder

A quick way to tend the device is to bring the climbing lanyard diagonally over the shoulder and attach it to the device. After ascent, the lanyard can be unclipped from the device.

Texas System

The Texas System uses an upper ascender tethered to the harness and a lower ascender connected to two foot loops and also tethered to the harness. The climber "alts", loading the upper ascender, and then stands in the foot loops and advances the upper ascender. Slower ascent than a Rope Walker style, but some find it easier to master.
