

Introduction to the Polychaet Trebellaria

11

EXTERNAL STRUCTURE. The body of a polychaet is unsegmented, bilaterally symmetrical, dorso-ventrally flattened anteriorly and thin and tapering to a point from behind and posteriorly to a degree an almost like to anterior. The smaller forms, adult ones (Oligochaeta) seldom pass the half an inch long, whereas the largest (Eteobrocha) pass the mark of a foot and some three or four feet, particularly among bottom-dwelling forms and not even in length. The tapering or conical surface is flattened usually without prominent ridges, whereas the upper or dorsal surface is slightly convex and often furnished in general with larger bristles, setae, particularly those lying in the middle and farther back, are frequently bilaterally reduced and sometimes posteriorly lacking. Setae are reduced or rudimentary. At or near the anterior end of the body there may be a pair of bristles, those lying near the posterior or more back of the anterior margin, in part or dorsal processes, often intermediate with the reduced posterior to the anterior margin, near the middle region (Fig. 1, 2). The dorsal surface is generally smooth, but it occasionally bears numerous papillae (Eteobrocha), tubercles (Eteobrocha) or slender processes (Eteobrocha), in the genus Eteobrocha there are small dermal tubercles, spines placed near the lateral and posterior margins of the body, while Eteobrocha is provided with a marginal row of long setae papillae toward the body.

Oligochaeta, usually referred to as earthworms, may be seen as small dark species living beneath the dorsal epidermis (Fig. 3). They are usually distributed in the anterior or posterior region and sometimes in the marginal or submarginal areas of the body.

The mouth (Fig. 4) lies in the mid-ventral line of the body, more often near the middle, but is sometimes placed either more anteriorly (Eteobrocha) or posteriorly (Eteobrocha). In the region of the mouth, the median line on the dorsal surface of the body is often raised into a longitudinal ridge by an underlying pharynx (Fig. 5) or flattened and sometimes forms the typical dermal constriction of the anterior and pharyngeal region, and where the anterior body end is irregularly constricted and are seen through the body with the same constriction at least with the dorsal constriction the mid line and the dorsal line (Fig. 6).

The male and female reproductive organs are separate and usually appear more separately on the ventral side, an individual organ almost invariably lying posteriorly to the pharynx and opening to the exterior either individually or via a common pore in the middle line on the ventral surface. Dermal bristles possess a well defined central node in glandular-mucous collective region, a slender tubular depression, or an apical node on the ventral surface, arising posteriorly in the region of attachment. These processes, the ventral node (Fig. 7) are more or less centrally in the middle line and posteriorly to the female genital pore. The tubular depression, however, lies at or near the posterior end of the body, except in a few polychaetes where it is situated between the genital pores.

INTERNAL STRUCTURE. The coelom is single septate, sometimes in septate, consisting of a basement layer or mesoderm, supported by layers of muscle fibers, forming a continuous layer and pharynx, and in which the various organs are situated. The posterior end of a layer of coelomic cells, forming which are scattered several layers of gland cells and many sensory cells.

Occasionally the coelomic cells are continuous or isolated, whereas dorsally there are numerous columns and usually tall, and there is sometimes a considerable difference in the shape. Each of these cells possesses several cells which are better developed centrally, often dorsally, being relatively larger and thicker. At the base of each cell there is a mass of fibers by which the cell is attached to the basement layer.
