

Legitimation Power And Religion In Modern Society

Nikos Kokosalakis
University of Liverpool

This paper suggests that a focus on the relation between religion, power and legitimation in modern society may provide fruitful theoretical directions for the sociology of religion and mitigate against the epistemological problems which the discipline has inherited from traditional sociological perspectives. Such an approach raises the question of the relationship of religion and politics in the context of the modern nation state and involves an examination of the nature of the cultural and moral framework within which power structures and power relations operate in modern society. The almost universal separation of church and state in western societies does not necessarily imply a corresponding separation between religious culture and politics. There is now sufficient evidence to suggest that the sociology of religion cannot continue to treat processes of legitimation and the secularization of political power in modern society as unproblematic issues.

Introduction

Uneasiness about the status and the theoretical foundations of the sociology of religion has been growing amongst its practitioners for sometime. Recently Richard Fenn (1982), in considering the state of the art, has suggested that the problem has now reached the level of epistemological crisis. Although I share his views I believe that the problem may lie even deeper than he suggests and has in fact to be located in the epistemological foundations of the classical sociological perspectives from within which the sociologists of religion operate. However, my intention here is not to engage in discussion concerning fundamental epistemological issues. Rather, I wish to suggest that a focus on the relationship between legitimation, power and religion¹ in modern society may lead to fruitful theoretical directions. I am aware that the subject is exceptionally broad and complex but the historical relationship between religion and power and developments in this area, in various parts of the world over the last twenty years, suggest that it cannot be a peripheral issue for the sociology of religion.

It is now a truism to say that in modern society, by and large, the legitimation of political power is no longer linked to traditional theologies and explicit religious symbolism as was clearly the case up to the 19th century. Yet, for the purpose of assessing the theoretical connection between religion and power in modern society, starting from the separation of religion and politics is misleading. Indeed, such separation implies that contemporary power struggles and power relations generally operate outside any religio-ideological and ethical context. Moreover assessing the question of legitimation and the function of religion in modern society from the standpoint of social and functional differentiation, as N. Luhmann (1969, 1977) does for instance, is bound to attenuate the ¹I define religion with D. Martin (1978:12) as "an acceptance of a level of reality beyond the observable world known to science, to which are ascribed meanings and purposes completing and transcending those of the purely human realm."
