 Pad sanders are of two types, orbital and straight-line, and are used mainly for the finish steps with the finer grades of sandpaper.

Unpadded sanding block usually saves time and work on rough surfaces. It cuts down high spots, sands out hollows and leaves a true surface.

to draw your forefinger lightly over the sanded surface diagonally or at right angles to the direction of sanding. Thus you can detect any minor depressions, or even slight roughness. Give these places, if any, a little more attention. But be careful not to cut through that old color acquired only by the aging of the wood.

New work can be handled a little more vigorously. If you are hand-sanding and you discover any slight ups and downs on the surface, make a special sanding block from a 5-in. length of 2 x 4. Cut the ends at an angle of 5 degrees or so, cut a strip of sandpaper to the exact width of the block and to such length that the ends will fold

Purpose of such a block is to run down high spots, ridges and the like and level the surface the first time over. Use a uniform pressure, overlap each stroke about one fourth the width of the workpiece. Don't allow the block to run the edges more than about one-half length or width. If there are knots in the wood to be retained as a decorative feature or a grain, remember these usually are of a different texture, harder than the surrounding wood, using the abrasive to cut somewhat slower in areas usually call for a few extra strokes in a sanding step to hold them flush. Keep a close watch when sanding certain softwoods having coarse, flat grain. There may be especially areas which tend to cut down faster, produce a surface of low ridges and shallow hollows. Changing sanding strokes to a slight angle of the grain usually disposes of this problem. Make a close check on progress with the finger-tip.
