This chapter will primarily examine the questions of why population ageing has occurred, how it is likely to develop in the future and what the potential economic consequences will be. It will also examine possible solutions to the problems associated with an ageing society, such as the viability of immigration as a potential solution.

2.2 Fundamentals of Population Ageing

The share of the Swedish population over the age of 65 increased from 8 to 17% during the twentieth century (see Table 2.1). This impressive increase marked a pronounced change from the stability during the previous period dating back to at least 1750, with a slight increase during the late nineteenth century (Statistics Sweden 1999, p. 21). The population pyramid for Sweden in 1900 (see Fig. 2.1) still has the classic pattern, with a broad base made up of younger people successively tapering off with increasing age to a pointed top, common in all agricultural societies in the past and found in many developing countries today.

The population structure in 2000, however, shows that this traditional pyramid shape was replaced during the preceding 100 years by a more urn-shaped age structure, with a smaller base and wider top than before. The proportion of elderly is expected to continue to increase, making the form more and more rectangular.
