abstract

Is the research process different than evidence-based practice and quality improvement, or is it the same? Scattered evidence and misperceptions regarding research, evidence-based practice, and quality improvement make the answer unclear among nurses. This article clarifies and simplifies the three processes for frontline clinical nurses and nurse leaders. The three processes are described and discussed to give the reader standards for differentiating one from the other. The similarities and differences are highlighted, and examples are provided for contextualization of the methods. [J Contin Educ Nurs. 2023;54(1):40-48.]

Perplexity related to research, evidence-based practice (EBP), and quality improvement (QI) still exists among nurses. As nurses wrestle with how to improve their approach to complex clinical issues, many nurses question the most appropriate method of inquiry to employ. Today, developing the competence to differentiate between these topics is critical and of particular importance as the Magnet® initiative of excellence drives the improvement of professional nursing practice and culture change. Thus, equipping nurses to generate practice-based evidence manifested in the research process, in the application of EBP, or as QI integration is a strategic priority. The current nursing profession transformation generates interest at the individual and organizational levels for distinguishing among these three methods of inquiry. Although research, EBP, and QI are related and intertwined, they are separate and different from each other. Selecting the appropriate approach to address the type of question at hand is of utmost importance. Clarification of the characteristics of each approach is also of great value.

Nurses play a critical role in the future of health care and have an opportunity to contribute to and leverage the multitude of existing scientific evidence to enhance the provision of quality patient care. In fact, nurses are increasingly responsible for leading or facilitating projects related to excellence and safety in patient care. These projects may take the form of research, EBP, or QI. A growing body of literature calls for improved education among nurses regarding the three methods of inquiry. Newhouse et al. (2006) cautioned nurses about the slippery slope when the line between research and QI is blurred, leading to potential confusion in their use. These authors discuss how two different speakers at a conference espouse the use of QI data as proof of the involvement of nursing in active research (Newhouse et al., 2006). Concerned by the
