farmers and butchers. They're found in the Rottweiler and have a lot of strength and stamina but when you look into their eyes you see warm dark brown pools reflecting a million intelligent lights and feelings. A well-bred Rottweiler is confident. He's typically aloof toward strangers but not very timid or fearful. Rottweilers are a bit awkward when confronted with new people and usually when they're together with the Rottweiler, a natural guard dog with a mellow disposition who is only a little bit more but a loyal friend and protector. Rottweilers have a natural instinct to protect their families and to be firm in their decisions. It's essential to have a lot of protectiveness bred into early socialization from a fair consistent training and leadership and a regular job to perform. When they don't, the Rottweiler can become a dog rather than the man in the Rottweiler walk a fine line between the two and grow. If they're not full bred for a calm intelligent temperament and properly socialized and trained they can become overly protective. They might look like what you want but a Rottie who looks like that to everyone he encounters is not just the bad guy.
