Chapter 10 - Perceiving in Action

The Role of Motion Perception

- Motion is a spatiotemporal, namely the relative change of position in space in a certain amount of time.
- On top of allowing visually-guided action, motion perception is crucial for figure-ground segmentation.
- Example: a camouflaged animal is easier to see when it is moving than when it lies still.
- Motion also helps in deducing the three-dimensional structure of objects, judging of their relative position in space and optimizing our own movement.
- Motion is also important for social communication as we heavily rely on the movement of facial muscles and lips for facial expressions and language.
- Perceiving movement is important for estimating that trajectory of incoming objects in order to interact with them and avoid harm. To do so, the visual system would theoretically simply need to estimate the absolute distance and the speed of approach of the incoming object.
- Like for most of our sensory systems, we are not very good at estimating absolute distance at which objects are from us is often unknown.
- In order to circumvent such a problem, it has been suggested that the visual system
