

The Luria-Nebraska Neuropsychological Battery in Forensic Assessment of Head Injury

By CHARLES J. GOLDEN, Ph.D.

In recent years, there has been increasing use of neuropsychological testimony in cases of head trauma and other situations which can lead to impairment of brain function. The rapid growth in this area has left some confusion as to the potential role of the psychologist and the role of neuropsychological testing in such cases. This article will address these issues, highlighting the major uses and issues in the area. For our purposes here, we will concentrate on the use of the Luria-Nebraska Neuropsychological Battery (LNNB). However, many of the comments can be applied to the more general area of the role of neuropsychological testing.

BASIC USES OF NEUROPSYCHOLOGICAL TESTING

Traditionally, neuropsychological testing has been used to identify whether the deficits shown by a patient are "organic" (related to injury to the brain) or "functional" (related to psychiatric disability). However, the recent growth of neuropsychology was not predicated on this traditional role, but rather has arisen with the recognition that a diagnosis of "organic" is at best only a first step in a more comprehensive analysis. One can have organic deficits which result in no real behavioral problems. Psychiatric disability can easily co-exist with brain injury, and indeed can be caused or complicated by brain injury.

As a result, neuropsychology has turned away from emphasizing such simple discriminations as an ultimate goal (although such a determination can represent a valid, initial step in a forensic case so as to determine whether further work is warranted). In modern neuropsychological examinations, the final goal of testing includes several inter-related steps: 1) determination of the presence of a brain dysfunction; 2) determining the extent and nature of the deficits caused by an injury; 3) determining the role of such deficits in an individual's ability to work, handle family responsibilities, take care of themselves, handle stress, and function inter-actively with other people; 4) determine the probable relationship of the deficits to the head injury or other hypothesized causes; and 5) to design rehabilitation or other treatment programs which will allow the individual to take maximum advantage of his or her remaining capacity.

Of crucial importance in achieving these goals is the acquisition of adequate and reliable data on which to base such opinion. In making decisions on
