

The NEET problem is structural, but has been exacerbated by the crisis

How much of the NEET problem is directly caused by the fall in labour demand during and after the great recession, and how much is structural? That is, are NEET rates expected to fall as labour demand picks up again, or are there obstacles to the employment of NEETs that go beyond business cycles – e.g. a mismatch between the skills of young people and the requirements of employers? Figure 1.6 shows the inactive and unemployed NEET rates on the OECD average since the late 1990s. The rate of inactive youth who are not in employment shows a slight but steady downward trend that continued throughout the crisis years – over the last 17 years, it fell by 2 percentage points. The unemployed NEET rate, however, clearly fluctuates with the business cycle. During the great recession, it increased significantly more than during previous downturns, reaching a maximum of 7.5% in 2013, significantly higher than any value observed during this time period.

This suggests that, while young people suffered severe job losses during the crisis, the average NEET rate across the OECD is not likely to fall more than 2 or 3 percentage points as the economy recovers. The structural component of the NEET problem therefore requires targeted policies that help young people overcome the barriers to employment they face, some of which are discussed in Section 6.

The high number of NEETs represents a significant cost to OECD economies

The high number of NEETs generates significant opportunity costs for OECD economies, as young people's time and skills go unused. The fact that the NEET problem is partly structural and therefore unlikely to disappear after OECD economies have fully recovered to the crisis, further adds to the importance of this recurring cost. This section provides a rough estimate of these costs to OECD countries.

NEET costs are defined as the gross labour income NEETs could command if they were employed, measured as the gross labour cost (including social security contributions).⁴ This cost can be considered as a proxy of the forgone productivity of NEETs. This section presents three estimates: upper and lower bound estimates, as well as a point estimate. The point estimate accounts for the fact that jobless young people may have a lower earnings potential
