

THESE ARE TRADITIONAL, FORMALISTIC TRANSPORTATION PLANNING ACTIVITIES. By mid-1960s, however, the METTFR had its genesis in a statement in the 1960 Metropolitan Plan, suggesting a review of the Plan within five years.¹⁰ Therefore, the basic guiding documents used by the Metropolitan Council Planning Board in its advisory role to the Metropolitan Council contained within it the seeds of its own demise. The transportation component of this 1960 Plan had been developed through the use of a computer program created for travel forecasting. As part of the overall Plan Review, the Planning Board decided to commission an independent study of the transportation component of the Plan. This "Metropolitan Plan Review: Transportation Study" was scheduled to begin in early 1970, but in June of that year, the province of Ontario conducted the partially completed Southern Expansion Study. The transportation resulted largely from citizen protests, and it is fair to say that as a result of the decision, transportation planning in Metropolitan Toronto was thrown into chaos for a while. It was seen by Metro as uncoordinated interference in local systems. Metro very much wanted to build the road. The upshot was that the provincial government emerged with a much more powerful role in Metropolitan transportation. The Metropolitan Council had been used to making such decisions and, naturally, had seen them as a new and demonstrably very powerful system.

The METTFR emerged during this major shuffle in political power in transportation.¹¹ Its official beginning was delayed, partly because political communications between Metro and the province on transportation matters broke down, and partly because the transportation study is still. Metro has tried a number of study directions. The Review finally began in the summer of 1972, by which time Metro and the province were again in more cordial terms.

The basic mandate of the METTFR was actually announced shortly after the Southern Expansion. In reviewing the transportation component of the 1960 plan, the METTFR was to consider the relationship between land use and transportation, public infrastructure financing, and especially transit system financing. Public involvement was seen as important, and high priority was given to social and economic criteria.

The METTFR was set up as an independent study group under its own director, and with staff hired for the duration and transferred from other agencies. Consultants were used on an "as required" basis. They did not play a major role in the Review. The METTFR reported to the Metro public Transport Planning Board, and to the Joint Southern Transportation
