

The 1988 Earthquake in Soviet Armenia: A Case Study

A major earthquake devastated the Armenian Republic of the Soviet Union on December 7, 1988, resulting in thousands of deaths and injuries. In a post-earthquake investigation of those towns seriously affected by the earthquake, we studied earthquake-related injury patterns, made observations on social and medical efforts, and postulated certain factors associated with increased morbidity and mortality. Information was obtained from official Soviet documents, interviews with survivors of the earthquake, and interviews with local, regional, and national government officials. Figures were based on assessments made by these officials in the field in the immediate post-earthquake period. One of a population of 4,388, there were 4,388 (100.0%) deaths and 1,244 (28.4%) injured (mostly men, 64.0%). Deaths and injuries were 87 and 11 times higher, respectively, among trapped than untrapped victims. Being outside at the time of the earthquake or having escaped to the outside from the collapsing structure was crucial for survival. Among persons located alive, 40% were rescued during the first 24 hours, mostly without the use of heavy equipment. This observation underscores the importance of early rescue response. As with all field surveys after disasters, there were methodological limitations to this study due to chaotic post-earthquake conditions. Accordingly, studies must be approached with caution. Nevertheless, these preliminary observations are striking and have prompted several new hypotheses for further investigations using more sophisticated analytical methods. (Epid. Infect. 123, Armenia 1995; Cherniack A, Jones KP, Schwartz KT. The 1988 earthquake in Soviet Armenia: A case study. Ann Emerg Med August 1995;17(4):577-587.)

INTRODUCTION

During the past 20 years, earthquakes have caused more than a million deaths worldwide. Better epidemiological knowledge of the causes of death and the type of injuries and illnesses caused by earthquakes is clearly essential for determining appropriate relief supplies, equipment, and personnel.¹⁻⁷ On December 7, 1988, an earthquake registering 6.9 on the Richter scale hit the northern part of the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic, one of the most earthquake active regions of the Soviet Union.^{8,9} (Figure 1). Caused by movement along a geological fault near the town of Spitak in the northwestern part of the country, the quake killed 40% of the national territory.¹⁰⁻¹² Of the 116 villages damaged, 54 were destroyed. A high percentage of Armenia's housing (33%) was destroyed or rendered unsuitable, and 700,000 of 700,000 persons were made homeless.¹³ Bridges, highways (eg, roads, power, gas, sewage systems), and industrial facilities were also seriously damaged.¹⁴ The toll in human lives was devastating: approximately 60,000 persons were reported trapped in collapsed buildings — 15,000 were successfully rescued, and 25,000 bodies were recovered from the rubble. Another 50,000 were known to be missing, of whom 12,000 required hospitalization.¹⁵⁻¹⁷

We conducted this survey during the period immediately after the earthquake to assess the epidemiologic impact of the disaster and to develop an understanding of the relationships among building characteristics, rescue access, search and rescue, medical care, and patient outcomes.
