Introduction

Pottery is one of the most ancient and popular form of Indian village art. Pottery in Indian villages has been in existence since the Indus Valley civilization and is still practiced in most of the Indian villages. The art of handling of clay is called Pottery and it is one of the earliest skills known to the Indians. The Indians are expert in molding clay with their hands to form various things of daily utility, toys and deities of worship since the ancient period. Pottery in Indian villages speaks volumes about the culture, traditions, architecture and inherent talent of the Indian artisans. Pottery is an eco-friendly and economically viable cottage village industry from way back to some centuries. It involves skill, intelligence and creativity.

The history of pottery in Indian villages dates back to the earliest civilization of India, the Indus Valley civilization. Many wonderful pieces of pottery have been found from the excavation of the Harappa and Mohenjodaro cities. Pottery was actually a medium of expressing one's emotions at the beginning. Ever since the Indus Valley Civilization, pottery making in India was a significant craft and the potters were always esteemed during that time. The potters were considered the best masters of trade. Pottery in Indian villages presents a wonderful amalgamation of concept, design and execution. Potteries can be both handmade and wheel-made, which is practiced all over India. Studies on socio-economic status of potters is available in present day from (Rakhee-2002), (Chayanray Meena-2005), (S. S. Solank-2008), (Suraj Saraf-2008),
