Abstract

This paper considers rural transport policy initiatives with reference to the problem of social exclusion in Northern Ireland. This includes the consideration of recent developments in community transport and policy developments through the Regional Development Strategy and Regional Transportation Strategy as well as the Rural Transport Fund for Northern Ireland.

Transport deprivation in rural areas has long been recognised as an important problem, but only recently have moves been made to try to overcome the problem. This paper reviews a number of transport initiatives in rural areas. As society becomes more mobile, so people living in both urban and rural areas wish to move around with minimum of difficulty. The desire to travel is, largely, satisfied in urban areas, but not so in rural regions as a result of the dispersed population here. Although car ownership levels tend to be high, significant transport problems are faced by those many people in rural areas with no access to any mode.

The paper uses case studies to illustrate recent policy developments that have resulted in the creation of many forms of community transport. These are forms of transport provided by members of the community in order to satisfy the requirements of those within their community. Initially the need for community transport was developed to meet the needs of the elderly and disabled. As a result of policy developments designed to promote social inclusion schemes are now being developed to meet the transport needs of other categories of users who may experience transport disadvantage to the same degree. These groups include women, the unemployed, single parents, and members of ethnic minorities. Community transport initiatives include the introduction of demand responsive and more localised services in areas inaccessible to scheduled or conventional bus services that may connect with scheduled services to transport people to their final destination.

These Community Transport initiatives have seen significant growth in recent years, mainly due to the development of the Regional Development Strategy (RDS) and the Regional Transportation Strategy (RTS) by the Department for Regional Development for Northern Ireland. This is the first time Northern Ireland has had a strategic Government document from which to develop, amongst other things, transport links in the region. The RDS highlights the issue of needing to 'promote social inclusion for those in rural areas of Northern Ireland, whilst also considering the wider social, environmental and economic implications of transport to rural communities. Concerns with deprivation and transport disadvantage have also been identified in the RTS, whilst recognising that a real impact can be had by the Transportation sector on some of the factors that cause social need and social exclusion and on the problems experienced by deprived and socially disadvantaged people in Northern Ireland. Much emphasis continues to be placed, throughout the strategy, regarding rural areas served by different types of accessible public transport drawn from a varied range, including flexible and community based services, responsive to local needs. Thus, it is recognised that the RTS for Northern Ireland contains three principle components: transportation initiatives composed of infrastructure or service
