

f) Gradual regulation of asylum-seeker flows

After several years of uninterrupted growth, a trend reversal was observed in all member countries (see Figure I.5). The reason for this is that the main host countries have reacted to the rise in asylum applications by accelerating application review procedures and by introducing restrictive measures such as extended visa regimes or stricter appeal procedures. More recently, some countries have taken specific measures aimed at systematically deporting all rejected asylum applicants, as well as denying social benefits to applicants who fail to file an asylum application on arriving in the country (see Part I.C on migration policies). The decline observed in 2003 is also partly attributable to the easing of a number of conflicts (e.g. in the former Yugoslavia or Afghanistan) that in recent years have helped to swell flows of asylum seekers, particularly towards European OECD member countries.

The United Kingdom received the largest number of asylum applications in 2003, despite a decline of over 25% compared with the previous year. The United States ranked in second place with approximately 79 800 applications, followed by France and Germany with slightly over 50 000 applications each, a figure equivalent to that of 2002 in the case of France but down by around 27% in the case of Germany. The decline was also very marked in Denmark (-32.2%), Australia (-26.6%), Ireland (-26.2%) and the Netherlands (-24.8%). Apart from the Central European countries (e.g. the Czech Republic and Poland) and Greece, which all reported significant increases, the number of asylum applications declined more or less throughout the OECD area. A total of 502 000 asylum applications were registered in the OECD area as a whole in 2003, i.e. 80 000 fewer than in 2002 (see Box I.2).
