

OFFENDER RISK ASSESSMENT

Guidelines for Selection and Use

JAMES BONTA

Solicitor General Canada

During the past 20 years, there have been significant developments in the area of offender assessment. As a result, this knowledge has placed the field in a position to construct guidelines as to what should characterize useful and effective offender assessment instruments. The author's suggestions as to what constitutes good assessment ranges from the noncontroversial (e.g., actuarial instruments) to the more contentious (e.g., lessening one's reliance on static risk scales). Whether the reader agrees with the views expressed, it is hoped that the force of the empirical arguments will at least provoke some careful consideration rather than summarily dismissing them.

For those who have to deal with offenders, either directly or indirectly, conducting assessments is simply part of their regular work routine. Any intervention with an offender requires an assessment of how the characteristics of the offender and the situation are related to a relevant outcome. Within a correctional context, there are many outcomes of interest. A correctional officer, for example, may need to judge whether a depressed inmate is suicidal. Parole board members consider the likelihood of an inmate adjusting to life in the community. A therapist must assess an offender's progress in treatment. The list can go on, but these examples are sufficient to demonstrate that offender assessments are not only common activities but also that the
