1. INTRODUCTION

"How do regions grow?" "Why do some regions grow more rapidly than others?" "Why are differences in levels of social welfare across regions so persistent?" These central questions have attracted the attention of a diverse group of scholars during the past fifty years. Topics that were initially of interest only to economists and geographers are now being investigated by sociologists, political scientists, and researchers from other social science disciplines. This growing interest in regional development studies is due in part to the recognition that the processes driving innovation and national economic growth are fundamentally spatial in nature. In short, "space matters."

This review and annotated bibliography give an overview of the theoretical literature on regional economic growth. The review is intended to serve as both a summary of the state of the field and an overview bibliography for use in a graduate course on this topic. Given that this field of inquiry spans several works in several disciplines, no attempt was made to give a comprehensive survey of all works in the field. Instead, I reviewed seminal works and comprehensive overviews of the most important theoretical concepts. Empirical works were not examined unless they contributed substantially to theory development. The annotated bibliography follows the same structure as the introduction. Within the annotated bibliography, references are organized alphabetically by section, but not every reference has a separate explanatory paragraph. The reference list at the end of the introduction only includes works not discussed in the annotated bibliography. To locate references in the annotated bibliography, the reader may refer either to the author index (iv) or the section of the annotated bibliography that corresponds to the section in the introduction.

The review places emphasis on three themes that are discussed throughout the regional development literature: (1) the theoretical predictions regarding the con-
