

PERSONAL REMINISCENCES

I do not propose, Ladies and Gentlemen, to deliver to you to-night a serious lecture upon my father's life from its public point of view; I have no analytical criticism of his works to offer you; nor am I going to tell you, with or without lime-light pictures, that his books are Household words, and that his characters are as real to you as if they were members of the circles in which you all live. This much I tell you at once, in order that I may earn your gratitude to start with. For I am sure that you have heard all these things from so many lecturers before, that you will be even anxious to express your thanks in advance to any occupant of this platform, who promises to refrain from going over all the old ground once more, and who is prepared to recognise the
