

Editor's Preface

AS MANY as three quarters of the British population now live in cities and it is expected that by the year 2000 half the population of the world will live in cities. The very size of these cities means that they are no longer homogeneous and their inner and outer areas, known as inner zones and suburbs, now have their own distinct characteristics. 'Inner city' no longer has a purely geographical connotation but has acquired additional meanings as various reports have defined their problems.

Of all the problems associated with inner cities, deprivation and its implications for health override all others. This is why the College should be involved. First, there is its obligation to patients. The College is concerned about all patients and one only needs to refer to Tudor Hart's (1971) well-known inverse care law to see why it should direct its greatest energies towards providing high quality care to those in greatest need.

Secondly, the College has a commitment to its members. College membership has for many years been relatively lower in the inner cities than in other parts of the country (RCGP, 1993), although some outstanding College members have undertaken pioneering work on this subject. Indeed, it was Jarman (1981) who first quantified the problem of deprivation in London, in Occasional Paper 16, and Bolden (1981) who, in the report of his prizewinning Upjohn Fellowship, highlighted many of the obstacles to development which were faced by general practitioners in inner cities at that time.

Members in deprived areas thus need all the support they can get. Nor should one make the mistake of thinking that deprivation is limited to inner cities – there are many general practitioners and primary health care teams working in other places with similar or sometimes quite different social problems. Rural deprivation, for example, strikingly calls for more research and understanding.

The College has already demonstrated its commitment to raising standards of care in inner cities, first by publishing the reports referred to above, and secondly by running a Conference in September 1990, with the support and encouragement of HRH The Prince of Wales, which brought together more than 200 health care professionals and highlighted some positive aspects of care in inner cities rather than dwelling on the bad. Following this initiative, the College set up an Inner City Task Force in July 1991, first under the chairmanship of Professor Sir Michael Drury, and now of Dr Iona Heath, whose remit included "seeking innovative solutions to problems of inner city practice". Setting up the Inner City Survey of General Practice was one such initiative and the results of the survey form the basis of this Occasional Paper.

A national institution such as the College must be careful to avoid the over-simplification that inner cities always means London and the authors of this report, from the Department of General Practice, St Mary's Hospital Medical School, were careful to avoid this. Starting with a review of the literature, they went on to quantify the problem and qualified this by consulting and listening to general practitioners nationwide. In this way they were able to identify solutions to problems and make recommendations for action.

This Occasional Paper therefore marks an opportunity for the College to emphasize its commitment not only to its patients but to its members and especially those who work where the burdens are heaviest and the responsibility of bringing medicine to a deprived population are often the greatest.

The report has been welcomed by the Council of the College and should provide a valuable basis for furthering the study of medicine in these important areas.
