

Reproduction and its Hormonal Control

Different mammals have different patterns of reproduction:

- Eg mammals, rats and mice can breed all year round, whereas others have distinct breeding seasons. This is to ensure that the young are born when food is abundant. The timing of the breeding season is regulated by a biological clock, which is probably adjusted by seasonal changes in day length.

In mammals the gametes (sex cells) are:

- small motile male gametes (sperm) which is produced in large quantities
- larger, non-motile food storing female gamete (ovum) which is produced in much smaller numbers

Gametogenesis is the formation of gametes:

- sperm production is called spermatogenesis
- where the eggs are formed (matured) is called oogenesis

In the females of all mammals, there is a cycle known as:

- Oestrous cycle → ovulation, when the female is most fertile
- Menstruation cycle → the uterus lining in all mammals undergoes a similar pattern of thickening during a reproductive cycle. However if fertilisation does not occur, the uterine lining of primates breaks down and it is discharged with blood through the vagina, whereas the uterine lining of non-menstruating mammals is reabsorbed and there is no excessive bleeding. The discharge of blood is called menstruation.
