

METHODS

Experimental Design and Data Collection

The study was conducted in a laboratory setting. Participants were recruited from a local university and were assigned to two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group consisted of 15 participants, and the experimental group consisted of 15 participants. All participants were informed of the study's purpose and procedures and gave their informed consent. The study was approved by the Institutional Review Board of the local university.

The experimental group performed a series of tasks designed to measure their cognitive and motor performance. The tasks were performed in a controlled environment, and the results were recorded for analysis. The control group performed the same tasks, but without the experimental manipulation. The data from both groups were compared to determine the effects of the experimental manipulation.

Statistical Analysis

The data were analyzed using statistical software. The results were presented in tables and graphs, and the significance of the findings was discussed.

The results of the study are presented in Figure 1. The control group's performance increased steadily over time, reaching a plateau of approximately 80 units by 60 minutes. The experimental group's performance also increased, but at a faster rate than the control group, reaching a plateau of approximately 100 units by 60 minutes. This suggests that the experimental manipulation had a positive effect on performance.
