

Philosophy of the present and meta-philosophies

Endre Kiss

Summary

We are trying to present a way we think is optimal for making meta-philosophies. Our approach starts from actual philosophical and historical progress (it indicates the way and importance of the neomarxism, the structuralism and the post-structuralism in the near past), and it settles at the moment of a characterization of two comprehensive philosophical imperia of the neopositivism/neoliberalism. We think, that a meta-philosophy shall be grounded by a mutual analysis of these two great complexes. Our paper does this mutual analysis on the basis of symmetric relations. For this reason, it grounds a possible theoretical view of a conceptual symmetry. An analysis of the conceptual symmetry of the neoliberalism/neopositivism and postmodernism leads to the formulation of the most important basic principles of a possible new and timely meta-philosophy. In both great philosophical complexes, basic characteristics, which make the symmetry possible, lie in a special distribution of the "open" and "closed" specificities of philosophies.

We consider the neomarxism as the integrating philosophical trend of the sixties. The great promise of the structuralism strongly rises beside it (sometimes amplifying it, sometimes polemically with it), which promises a radically new model of science, that would also have eminent philosophical consequences. Obviously, right from the start, these both giant integrating trends also motivate other trends. At the end of the sixties, but especially in the mid-seventies, the philosophical neomarxism ceased to exist as with a blow of a natural disaster and the structuralism also announced, that its aspirations were impossible to proceed in a correct and open hitherto unprecedented way. There comes a philosophical vacuum, in which two factors seem to be defined from the beginning : one basic fact is, that there is a philosophical vacuum, but not a 'philosopher-vacuum'. This means, in this new situation, that each group of thought producers is being placed already in a pre-defined structural position from the beginning, and the act of filling the vacuum itself grows mainly from the fight of each relevant group of philosophers (moreover, scientists or even politicians of philosophical relevance) starting from these positions. Therefore, the intellectual-political position (actually position of intellectual power) often crystallizes before a new philosophical standpoint. On the other hand, from the nature of this philosophical vacuum (partly from determinations of the two most important declining trends, partly from determinations of other environmental conditions), it shall be filled only with meta-philosophical ideas, as in the circumstances given, it is unimaginable to find any "normal paradigm" which could fill the vacuum of this double decline in a naturally dynamic way.

The structuralism and the neomarxism had not completely filled out philosophical space preceding the postmodernism, not even in their decline which did not take place much later. Yet, this does not mean, that we should enumerate other trends here, for other relevant trends (most of all the phenomenology and the existentialism, but in some contexts even the Stalinist
