

PHOTOVOLTAICS Sunlight to Electricity in One Step

The principle behind conversion of solar energy to electricity through the use of photovoltaic cells is described. The photovoltaic effect produces electrical energy from a 'free' renewable source, the sun. It holds promise for remote energy supply where conventional nonrenewable energy is not practical.

Photovoltaic Principle

The photovoltaic effect is one in which sunlight is converted directly into electricity. The conversion takes place within the solar or photovoltaic cell. A number of cells are wired together to form a panel. A group of panels is described as a photovoltaic array (see Figure 1). Each panel shown is approximately 0.3 m by 1.2 m.

The solar cells are actually semi-conductor devices made of two very thin layers of specially treated material, commonly silicon. When light falls on the cell, photons are absorbed and electrons set free. Excess electrons accumulate on the negative side of the cell. If a wire is connected between the two layers, one positive and one negative, a flow of electrons occurs. This becomes an electrical source able to power a motor, lights etc. The incoming sunlight keeps the process going (see Figure 2).
