Online posting date: 15th September 2010

One of the most important unanswered questions in evolutionary biology is why sexual reproduction is so common. In theory, sex is so costly that individuals that reproduce sexually should be at a major disadvantage relative to asexually reproducing competitors. This leads to the expectation that sex should lose in competition with asexual reproduction and thus be rare in nature, which is in striking contrast to its widespread occurrence. It is this profound disconnect between theory and reality that has motivated decades of research into potential advantages of sexual reproduction. While much progress has come from these efforts, why sex predominates is still unclear. It is likely that part of the answer is linked to an advantage of sex under pressure from coevolving parasites. Other important processes may be more efficient clearance of deleterious mutations and other costs associated with asexuality that are not direct consequences of the lack of recombination.

Introduction

What is sexual reproduction?

Sexual reproduction is defined as the production of offspring via recombination between two distinct parental genomes (recently reviewed in Schurko et al., 2009). Nearly all eukaryotic taxa are sexual, at least some of the time. Why sexual reproduction is so common is paradoxical because sex is extremely costly relative to asexual reproduction and should thus be lost when sexuals experience direct competition with asexuals. See also: DNA Recombination; Linkage and Crossing over; Variation, Within Species; Introduction

Costs of sexual reproduction

The cost of males

The most important cost of sex is that of male production (Maynard Smith, 1978). The cost of males is best illustrated by a comparison of the growth rate of otherwise equal sexual and asexual populations. Females that reproduce asexually only make daughters, whereas sexual females produce both sons and daughters. This discrepancy in the rate of daughter production has important consequences when sexual and asexual females compete for the same resources. If all else is equal between the two groups (e.g., females have similar life histories, physiological tolerances, dietary needs, biological enemies and habitat preferences, and are sympatric), sexual females are predicted to lose in competition to asexual females. This is simply because males do not make offspring directly, and thus do not contribute to the growth rate of the sexual population (Figure 1). Hence, the cost of males refers to the slower growth rate of the sexual population caused by male production. Modelling the severity of this cost reveals that a sexual population of 10^5 individuals (sex ratio 1:1) is expected to succumb to an invasion of a single asexual mutant in less than 50 generations (Lively, 1996). The rapidity with which sex is expected to be lost is why the maintenance of sex under the pressure of invading asexuals is such an intriguing problem for evolutionary biologists. Clearly, whichever mechanism(s) are maintaining sex must operate rapidly enough that they can generate advantages for sex within a few dozen generations. The cost of recombination

Recombination has a direct cost in organisms that are well adapted to their environment: it breaks apart favourable gene combinations ('recombination load'; recently reviewed in Otto, 2009). It is not currently clear how common or important recombination load is when
