American Code of Marine Signals ... Henry J. Rogers, 1855 A Maritime History of Bath, Maine and the Kennebec River Region William A. Baker, 1973 A Middy of the Slave Squadron: A West African Story Harry

Collingwood, 2007-01-01 Phew ejaculated Mr Perry first lieutenant of His Britannic Majesty s corvette Psyche as he removed his hat and mopped the perspiration from his streaming forehead with an enormous spotted pocket handkerchief I believe it s getting hotter instead of cooler although by all the laws that are supposed to govern this pestiferous climate we ought to be close upon the coolest hour of the twenty four Just step aft to the skylight Mr Fortescue and see what the time is will ye It must surely be nearing two bells Ay ay sir I dutifully answered and moving aft to the skylight raised the canvas cover which had been placed over it to mask the light of the low turned lamp which was kept burning all night in the fore cabin and glanced at the clock which screwed to the coaming on one side of the tell tale compass balanced the barometer which hung in gimbals was suspended on the other side The clock marked the time as two minutes to five a m or within two minutes of two bells in the morning watch Dropping the canvas screen back into place I was about to announce the time to my superior officer when I thought I caught through the faint creak of the ship s timbers and the light rustling of the canvas aloft a slight far off sound like the squeak of a sheave on a rusty pin Therefore instead of proclaiming the time aloud I stepped quietly to the side of the first luff and asked almost in a whisper Did you hear anything just then sir Hear anything reiterated Mr Perry unconsciously lowering his usually stentorian voice in response to the suggestion of secrecy conveyed by my whisper no I can

t say that I did What d ye mean Mr Fortescue I mean sir I replied that I thought I caught a moment ago a sound like that of ah did you hear that then sir as a voice uttering some words of command apparently in the Spanish language came floating to us faint but clear across the invisible water upon which the Psyche lay rolling almost imperceptibly Ay I did answered Mr Perry modulating his voice still further No mistake about that eh There s a craft of some sort out there less than a mile distant I should say Did you catch the words They sounded to me like some foreign lingo No sir I replied I did not quite catch them but as you say they appeared to be foreign and I believe they were Spanish What about striking two bells sir It only wanted two minutes On no account whatever Mr Fortescue hastily interrupted my companion On the contrary have the kindness to slip for ard and caution the watch not to sing out or make the slightest noise on any account but to come quietly aft if they happen to have anything to report And when you have done that kindly go down and call Captain Harrison Ay ay sir I answered and kicking off my shoes lest the sound of them upon the deck should reach the stranger through that still and breathless atmosphere I proceeded upon my twofold errand But it is time to tell the reader where the Psyche was upon this dark and stifling night what she was doing there and why the precautions above referred to were deemed necessary As has already been mentioned the Psyche was a British man o war She was a sloop armed with fourteen long 18 pounders and carried a crew which had originally consisted of one hundred and thirty men but which had now been reduced by sickness and casualties to one hundred and four all told She was a unit in the somewhat scanty Slave Squadron which Great Britain had stationed on the West African coast for the suppression of the infamous slave trade and when this story opens namely about the middle of the year 1822 had been upon the station nearly two years during the whole of which period I Richard Fortescue hailing from the neighbourhood of the good town of Plymouth had been on board her and now held the responsible position of senior midshipman being at the above date just turned seventeen years of age
