

George Gallion walked into Tad's Barber-shop to get a haircut and came out with one of the biggest headaches in the Valley—the job of principal at Kensington High School. In the eighteen years since he had first had this job, Mr. Gallion had become a well-known, highly honored educator. Now he was a sick man and, under doctor's orders, had retired from work.

But teaching was more than a job to George Gallion; it was his life. When he learned that Kensington High, once the best school in the county, might not be able to open that fall, he ignored his doctor's warnings and his wife's pleas. The school's six hundred students needed him; so did the tiny staff of six teachers. And the fact that vandalism, truancy, smoking and gambling raged uncontrolled among the students while the board of education (concerned only with their coming election) refused to offer much help was just an added incentive.

So into these terrible conditions, made worse by the economic conditions that were threatening the whole Valley, strode Mr. Gallion with his old-fashioned ideas about courage and discipline, which included making cooperative pupils and
