

One is tempted to apply this metaphor to Cordova's entire chapter as well, seeing it as a text of shifting sand, with a barrel of inherited languages, underneath a plank of concepts, on which Cordova, as ethical artist, dances. From this perspective, our duty as readers would be to maintain our interpretive balance, and to listen to our bodies as we struggle in our own responsive dances to remain astride. What we would seem to learn would be that boundaries between different concepts—Western/Indigenous, artist/scientist, artist/non-artist, aesthetics/ethics—are constantly being transgressed within Indigenous philosophy. All the while, the necessary scaffolding of order is maintained, albeit primarily by the flow of words rather than their rigid conceptual denotations.

To summarize Cordova's chapter, the world is ordered, and the artist is a scientific healer maintaining that order, but the world is also a dynamic process, and thus the artist also co-creates the world. But the creative imagination of the artist is also ordered, but there is no artist (as opposed to non-artists), and there is no distinction between aesthetics and ethics. Therefore, we are left with a metaphor of poetic order (chaotic cosmos), dancingly balancing on a board balanced on a barrel shifting in the disordered sand. Put differently, the world, the artist, the individual, and aesthetics are all caught up in a poetic transgression of boundaries. In short, Indigenous aesthetics is constituted by a spectrum of artist-to-worldwide poetic boundary-transgression.

VI. Conclusion: Indigenous Absence

To unify the above analysis, I offer a new term, "indigenous absence." Developed in my larger project on Cherokee philosophical history, "indigenous absence" means that, just as the indigenous Cherokee people (and many other Native American tribes) are the slandered, disenfranchised, suppressed and covered-over Indigenous peoples of the North American continent, poetry writ large (including Indigenous philosophy) is the slandered, disenfranchised, suppressed and covered-over arche of Western philosophy. That is, both Indigenous philosophy and culture, and poetry in general (by Westerners and the Indigenous), are indigenously absent. Put differently, just as there is an absence today in North America of most of the people indigenous to this continent, so there is an absence today in philosophy of most of the poetry that is indigenous to it; both are based on what was there first and yet continued to be denied.

To elaborate on the latter point, formality is indigenously absent from Indigenous philosophy vis-à-vis traditional Western philosophy. Indigenous philosophy, as represented within American Indian Thought, essentially lacks a set of abstract, purely formal principles that operate independently of embodied beings, concrete human practices, and the richness of nested contexts. Indigenous philosophy is therefore both
