

6 Towards a post-industrial service society

Thomas P. Boje

Introduction

The major sociological theories of the service or 'post-industrial' society were developed more than two decades ago (Bell 1976; Touraine 1969). These theories were formulated in a period when the present knowledge and information society was in its embryonic phase. Daniel Bell (1976), who has most coherently formulated a theory on the development towards a post-industrial society, combines three important trends to describe the development of this society: First, the impetus behind growth and productivity is to increase knowledge in all kinds of economic activities through the information process. Second, a shift in economic activities from goods production to service production occurs in all industrial societies. Third, a restructuring of the occupational structure is characterised by a development from manual to non-manual professional jobs requiring a large amount of scientific knowledge and information. Knowledge and technology have become even more important in determining economic and social structures. However, this theory and similar theories of the development of post-industrial service societies have been questioned by social scientists (see Chapter 1 in this volume).

The concept of service and the expansion of services have thus been criticised. For example, some theorists have postulated that growth in service jobs has been more modest than argued (Cohen and Zysman 1987; Gershuny 1978). Large amounts of the present service production were previously done either outside the formal economy as unpaid work in the households (Offe 1985: 108) or closely connected to the goods production taking place in companies (Gershuny 1978). Furthermore, a comprehensive externalisation or outsourcing of previous industrial jobs has taken place and increased the size of the service sector during the past couple of decades. According to Sayer and Walker (1992), this transition of the production from goods-producing into service-producing is primarily the result of a restructuring of the economic and social division of labour but has not fundamentally transformed the economic mechanisms of the industrial societies.

Recently, the discussion of post-industrial society has taken a new turn because of theories on the transition from an industrial society to an information society. According to Castells (1996), two major processes have transformed work and employment: the massive diffusion of new information technologies in the work
