Harlen,Heather Malcolm,1999 Using a best evidence synthesis model this book reviews research conducted in primary elementary and secondary schools in the United States and in Great Britain on setting and streaming ways of grouping pupils according to ability The review concludes that research provides no evidence that student achievement at the primary elementary school level is raised either by streaming grouping by general ability or setting grouping by subject ability within the school Within class ability grouping at the elementary school level has been found to have advantages for mathematics achievement At the secondary level there is no consistent and reliable evidence of positive effects of setting and streaming in any subjects or for students of particular ability levels Evidence suggests that teachers sometimes treat mixed ability groups as though they were low ability groups and that even experienced teachers frequently use inappropriate whole class teaching methods with mixed ability classes What is important in determining achievement is that the challenge and support given to learners meet their needs Contains 168 references KB School Review Monographs National Society of College Teachers of Education,1925 How to Do Research in Education Carter Victor Good,1928 Advances in Education Research
