Ariail, 2020-11-30 After World War II the United States used international sport to promote democratic values and its image of an ideal citizen But African American women excelling in track and field upset such notions Cat M Ariail examines how athletes such as Alice Coachman Mae Faggs and Wilma Rudolph forced American sport cultures both white and Black to reckon with the athleticism of African American women Marginalized still further in a low profile sport young Black women nonetheless bypassed barriers to represent their country Their athletic success soon threatened postwar America's dominant ideas about race gender sexuality and national identity As Ariail shows the wider culture defused these radical challenges by locking the athletes within roles that stressed conservative forms of femininity blackness and citizenship A rare exploration of African American women athletes and national identity Passing the Baton reveals young Black women as active agents in the remaking of what it means to be American Playing Nice Mary Jo Festle, 1996 Few aspects of American military history have been as vigorously debated as Harry Truman's decision to use atomic bombs against Japan In this carefully crafted volume Michael Kort describes the wartime circumstances and thinking that form the context for the decision to use these weapons surveys the major debates related to that decision and provides a comprehensive collection of key primary source documents that illuminate the behavior of the United States and Japan during the closing days of World War II Kort opens with a summary of the debate over Hiroshima as it has evolved since 1945 He then provides a historical overview of the events in question beginning with the decision and program to build the atomic bomb Detailing the sequence of events leading to Japan's surrender he revisits the decisive battles of the Pacific War
